Call Centre Outbound

Course Overview

In order to function successfully within a Call Centre it is important that callers are assisted in a pleasant and effective manner and, where possible, are prompted to (maximum) action. Communicating with insight and customer service skills using a clear conversational structure with callers, will not only prevent mistakes, but will also get the best result from the call - for the caller, as well as for your company or organization.

What exactly is a Call Centre? An image of a big hall in which dozens of agents with headsets sit, springs to mind. The agent, provided with all sorts of modern automated equipment, continuously carries on conversations with callers and people being called. Large screens are located in the background on which the number of waiting calls is listed. This image is, of course, the true picture. In addition, in the case where people have been 'freed up' in an organization to actively phone customers, for example, they have their phone lines open the whole day for callers, these people jointly, could also be referred to as a Call Centre. It is true that in the latter case, no use is made of particularly advanced switchboards, automatic calling systems, or customer information within reach on-line, but the result has to be the same - a satisfied caller, and the maximum output from these calls.

The Call Centre will certainly retain its current place as a selling or information conduit and is likely to gain even more popularity in the future. You and to your customer's perception and satisfaction.

Approach

The participants learn from practical exercises, mostly with the aid of telephone equipment. By carrying out the activities, watching, listening, carrying out the activities again, and then discussing the practical situations, they can make the theory and the skills their own in a very short time. The practical exercises and phone calls are recorded on cassettes and/or videotapes.
